Guiding principles and cross-cutting issues

The Programme will use the following guiding principles in the implementation and monitoring of the programme to ensure approaches across the sub-results/outputs are directed in a common manner. The principles build upon UNDP's, UNICEF's and partners global experience and work in Georgia.

A. Evidence based programming and measuring and capturing results:

The project will monitor results and demonstrate achieved progress and will embed systematic M&E approaches into all aspects of programming (e.g. baseline assessments, capacity assessments of institutions, user-surveys, etc.).

B. Gender equality, women and youth empowerment:

A gender equality perspective will be mainstreamed throughout the project, through ensuring the collection and interpretation of sex / age disaggregated data relevant to project indicators and conducting gender analysis to better inform project design and implementation. The project will prioritise in particular women's access to justice services and women's participation and role (including decision making) in the justice system. Specifically, the project will strive toward the following:

- Seek to ensure that gender equality issues are incorporated into all relevant policies and legislation, and that justice institutions and processes are equal and fair for both women and men;
- Advocate for the increased participation of women and youth in justice sector policy-making and actions at the institutional level and support their active engagement in civil society;
- Ensure that policy and planning processes are consultative and participatory, and actively encourage the involvement and decision making role of women and youth, as well as marginalized and vulnerable groups; ensure that plans and services are sensitive to their specific needs;
- Ensure gender issues are fully incorporated in curricula and training materials that are developed;
- Ensure close co-ordination and collaboration with other UNDP, UNICEF, OHCHR and ILO activities related to specific aspects of women's empowerment and gender issues.

3.4. Sustainability of results:

The main objective of this JP is to enhance the capacities of state institutions and improve mechanisms for protecting human rights in Georgia. After the completion of the JP, it is expected that key government institutions will be able to pursue the objective of protecting the human rights of the population and effectively implement necessary actions for this purpose.

Striving to this end, the UN Agencies will continue well-established cooperation with all relevant stakeholders within all branches of power, as well as with CSOs and the international community in the country. Effective implementation of the JP will improve legislative framework, enhance the capacities of state and non-state actors, increase awareness of the citizens and subsequently ensure the sustainability of the actions related to protection, monitoring, and promotion of human rights in the country.
